What happens when a double major in chemistry and fine arts decides to pursue a medical profession? An aesthetic plastic surgeon whose diverse and extensive education perfectly complements his one-of-a-kind approach to the art of transforming people. Dr. Babak Dadvand – specializing in gynecomastia and transgender top surgery in Beverly Hills, California – has been changing patients' lives for the past nine years with a strong commitment to ethical integrity in every aspect of his job.

As an undergrad, Dadvand pursued oil painting and figure sculpting which he later intertwined with his knowledge of human anatomy in medical school. His artistic eye is what sets him apart from his colleagues and ensures a meticulous assessment of the patient's body which then leads to a successful surgery leaving both doctor and patient equally happy.

But it has to start with the right relationships and the right perspective. "You can't have the same approach with every patient. All patients are coming from different starting points, whether physically or emotionally, or even psychologically," says Dadvand. He demonstrates a straightforward, practical yet gentle care giving in each individual case. "You've got to give a really honest appraisal of what they need. It's a relationship. It's not something a patient comes and dictates, but it's [also] not something the physician dictates where the patient just stands there while the doctor says whatever he wants to say and does whatever he wants to do," he adds. Dadvand's honest method not only plays out during the consultation but also in the practical aspects of the job. From start to completion, he walks alongside every patient. His further secret to success lies in the thorough follow-up and aftercare which is a crucial part of Dadvand's core beliefs.

Performing transgender top surgery, though a sensitive subject, is handled with confidence and care. Before discussing the technical details, Dadvand makes it a priority to know the motivating factors behind each patient's desire for change. "When they come in for the consultation, the first thing that I do is to determine what their starting point is," he elaborates. "Have they been diagnosed with gender dysphoria? Have they lived as the opposite sex for any continuous time? What's their family support network? Where are they psychologically? Are they seeing or have they seen a therapist?" Sometimes people wonder if Dadvand is too cautious with offering help to people, but in his mind, the patient's well-being is above all else, including finances.

He takes a firm stance to do what is right – instead of what is easy and often tempting. "I never let financial aspects dictate my decision-making," Dadvand affirms. "I think once you start down on that slippery slope, it's a short deep fall. Money comes and goes, but relationships last for a long time."

It is no surprise that Dr. Dadvand is considered a top plastic surgeon in Beverly Hills: His medical expertise and genuine care for his patients, regardless of their background, result in well-deserved five-star ratings at all times.
